1885 Mag. Lorne (title), Imperial Federation. 1886 Pall Mall G. 16 June 11/1 A paper was read by Sir George F. Bowen on 'The Federation of the British Empire.' He adopted Mr Forster's definition of 'Imperial Federation—viz., such a union of the mother country with her colonies as would keep the British Empire one State in relation to other States, through the agency of an organization for common defence, and a joint foreign policy.

2 A society or league formed for joint action or mutual support, now chiefly, a body formed by a number of separate states, societies, etc., each retaining control of its own internal affairs

Now often in names of political societies and trade unions, as the Miners' Federation, the National Liberal Federation, the Social Democratic Federation, the Shipping Federation. 1791 Burke App. to Whigs Wks. This would account fairly well for the sense, but involves too much hypothesis to be accepted with confidence It is curious, if the word be of Teut formation, that there is no direct proof of its having existed in any Teut language, nor is it found even in the L text of the Frankish laws]

In the plural felgas it was the voiced guttural spirant, which in late ME developed into w, producing the β forms In the dative felge it was the voiced palatal spirant, and thus very early became vocalized as y, whence the γ forms. The δ forms are due to the normal unvoicing of the g where it was final, viz in the nom and accus sing, the resulting sound (x) eventually developed into ff in enough, etc, in some dialects, however, it became (k, t) and in others was dropped (With the forms felf, felk, fel the Derbyshire place name now variously spelt Felley, Felk, but in 1380 Felf.) 7 In college and university use:

a org The name (corresponding to the Latin socius) given to the incorporated members of a college or collegiate foundation (whether in a University or otherwise, see College 4); one of the company or corporation who, with their head, constitute a 'college'; e. g. 'the Provost and Fellows of Chelsea College, of Eton College, or King's College, Cambridge', 'the Warden and Fellows of All Souls, Oxford'.

In colleges chiefly devoted to the purposes of study and education, the Fellows were, in early usage, often included under the term Scholars, and the latter term is now mostly restricted to junior members of the foundation, who are still under tuition, the term fellow being applied to the Senior Scholars after they are graduated, or otherwise passed out of the stage of tutelage. In those colleges that have become educational institutions, undertaking the school or university teaching of youths not on the foundation, the Fellows consist of those graduate members who have been co opted upon the foundation with emoluments from its corporate revenue, and who constitute with their Head (usually elected by the Fellows from their number) the governing body of the institution. Most colleges of this class have now also Honorary Fellows, who receive no emoluments and have no share in the government. When a distinguished man vacates his fellowship, he is often elected an honorary fellow c 1449 Pecock Repr III xviii 401 That the master and the fellows kepe the statutis of the college 1535–8 Act 3 Hen VIII, c. 23 § 5 Any persone being fellowe or scoler of any of the said Colleges 1644 Hunton Vind Presb Monarchy 41 The Colledges, the Fellowes have an effectuall, and more then morall limiting Power. 1691 Wood Ath Oxon I 17 Thomas Lynacre was chosen Fellow 1884 in Athenæum 1 Mar 278 T. Taylor Fact Rise Univ xiii 247 It was thus a college composed solely of 'Fellows'.

b On the analogy of the preceding use, the designation 'Fellows' is now applied, in some universities, to the holders of certain stipendiary positions (called 'Fellowships') tenable by elected graduates for a limited number of years, on condition of pursuing some specified branch of study.

The Radcliffe and the Craven Travelling Fellowships are the only examples in the ancient English Universities. Fellowships in this sense have been founded in the Scottish Universities, in the University of Durham and the Victoria University, and in some universities and colleges in the U S 1888 Histor Reg Univ Oxf 110 Every Fellow is required to spend at least eight months of each year of his tenure of the [Craven] Fellowship abroad Ibid 112 The first two Fellows were elected [to Radcliffe's Travelling Fellowships] in July 1715 1890–3 Edin. Univ. Cal. 537 Scholars, Bursars, or Fellows must apply to the Convener of the Science Degrees Committee.

c In some of the younger British universities and colleges, and in some of those in the U S, the 'Fellows' are the members of the governing or administrative body; in others the title is merely honorary, conferred as a special distinction on a limited number of graduates. Cf sense 8

1837 Charter Univ Lond, The Chancellor, Vice Chancellor, and Fellows..shall constitute the Senate of the said University.

8. The title given in various learned societies, either to all their members (as in the Royal Society, the Society of Antiquaries), or to a specially privileged class among them.

In the case of the Royal Society, the official Latin equivalent is sodalis

1664 Title, A List of the Fellows of the Royal Society. 1709 Steele Tatler No 15 P 2 A Fellow of the Royal Society, who had writ upon Cold Baths. 1801 Med Jrnl V 314 A Fellow, that is, any Member who resides within seven miles of London 1886 Act 49–50 Vict c 48 § 6 A fellow of a college of physicians.

10. † a Used as the customary title of address to a servant or other person of humble station Obs

In 14th c. it implied polite condescension, = 'comrade', 'my friend' (cf mod F mon ami similarly used). In Shakspere a time thus notion had disappeared, but the word when addressed to a servant does not seem to have necessarily implied haughtiness or contempt, though its application to one not greatly inferior was a gross insult (cf 9).

Felon (fe·lǫn), a. and *sb.*¹ Forms α 3–5 felon(e, -un(e, 4–6 felown(e, Sc. felloun(e, 5 felone, (feleyn), 6–8 felon(e, 3– felon β (in adj. only) 4–5 felo(u)n, cf. felunsly s.v. FELONLY [a OF felon adj. and sb. = Pr. felon, felhon, fellon adj., Sp. felon, It. felone adj. and sb. –vulgar L. fellōn em* From its formation, the word must have been originally a sb., fel (–fellis), whence FELL a., being the adjectival form (–fellōn-) the oblique case, but so far as documentary evidence goes, both forms were indiscriminately used in OF as adj., and the recorded substantive of the latter is derivative. The curious Eng. form felouns adj. may perh. be due like fiers FIERCE) to the -s of the nom. case in OF. (in this instance a product of analogy)
In the ultimate etymology is uncertain. Of the many conjectures proposed the most probable is that fellone-n is a derivative of L. fell, fel gall, the original sense being 'one who, or something which, is full of bitterness' (or venom, the two notions, as many languages testify, being closely associated in the popular mind). In support of this view it may be pointed out that the sb. has had the senses of 'an envenomed sore' and 'cholera' (see FELON *sb.*²); moreover, this etymology accounts perfectly for the strangely divergent senses which the adj. has in the Rom. langs., 'wicked', 'angry', 'brave', 'melancholy, sad' (It. felone), 'extremely painful'. Of the other suggestions that have been made the most plausible is perhaps that of Prof. R. Atkinson of Dublin, that felon was originally a term of reproach, like villain as used in a peculiar sense by Martial and Catullus. Some scholars think that felon is from OHG. fëlle, an unrecorded derivative of fëlan to scourge, cf. med.L. felonia vb., others have sought for it in connexion with the obscure second element in the OE. words wælfel (from wæl carnage, occurring only once, as an epithet of the raven) and wælfel, talfel (unusually supposed to be from fel all), -fel being perh. a variant of dēfor poison) The mod Da. fel horrible, disgusting, has also been compared, the MDu. felle is adopted from Fr. The Celtic words often cited are out of the question; the OF. word cannot have come from Wales or Ireland, and Gaulish appears not to have possessed the sound f, the Welsh ff and the Irish fh do not correspond etymologically.]

In class I, femella occurs only with the sense 'little woman', but in popular Lat it appears to have been used, like the equivalent mod Gr θηλάκιον, to denote the female of any of the lower animals, and hence as a designation of the sex in zoology. Femella is not classical, but used already in class Lat both as sb. and adj. = 'female'. The Fr word is always sb. chiefly as sb. (though a few instances occur of its use as adj.), and L. femelle adj. is the form serving for both grammatical genders. In Eng., on the other hand, the adjectival use is by far the more prominent. The feeling of the mod. lang. apprehends the sb. as an absolute use of the adj. In 14th c. the ending was confused with the adjectival suffix -el, -al, the present form female arises from association with male, with which it rimes in Parlour 225.]

Fermentation (fəmĕntē·ʃən) [ad L. fermentātiōn-em, n of action of fermentāre to Ferment. In all senses of ferment and fermenting

1 A process of the nature of that resulting from the operation of leaven on dough or on saccharine liquids.

The features superficially recognizable in the process in these instances are an effervescence or internal commotion, with evolution of heat, in the substance operated on, and a resulting alteration of its properties. Before the rise of modern chemistry, the term was applied to all chemical changes exhibiting these characters, in Alchemy it was the name of an internal change supposed to be produced in metals by a 'ferment', operating after the manner of leaven In modern science the name is restricted to a definite class of chemical changes peculiar to organic compounds, and produced in them by the stimulus of a 'ferment' (see Ferment sb 1), the various kinds of fermentation are distinguished by qualifying adjs, as acetous, alcoholic, butyric, lactic, putrefactive, etc (see those words) In popular language the term is no longer applied to other kinds of change than those which it denotes in scientific use, but it usually conveys the notion of a sensible effervescence or 'working', which is not involved in the chemical sense

-ferous, in actual use always -iferous (i fĕras), an adjectival suffix f L -fer producing (f ferre to bear) + -ous In Lat the suffix -fer was always preceded by i, either belonging to the stem as in pestifer, substituted for the stem-vowel as in ensifer, or inserted as a connecting vowel as in arifer, so that the suffix practically appears in Lat as -ifer, and in Eng as -iferous In Eng it appeared first in words taken from Lat, either directly or through Fr adaptations in -fère, as in aurriferous, baccifer-ous, biferous, cruciferous, frugiferous, glandiferous, lactiferous, metalliferous, odoriferous, pomiferous, rosiferous, saxpsiferous, thuriferous, vociferous

Fetch (fetʃ), sb 2 [Of obscure origin

Although Grose in our first quot assigns the word to the north of England, there seems to be no other evidence that the simple sb was ever in popular use elsewhere than in Ireland The supposition that it is shortened from Fetch-life, or some equivalent compound of the vb stem, would plausibly account for the sense. On the other hand, it may be noted that the Corpus Glossary 2 800 has ' Exercs mere ' As face seems to admit of no explanation as a Lat word, it may be conjectured to be OF , and the source of the present sb ; in the archetype followed face and mere (mutilation) may have been given as alternative English glosses on some I at word, and the compiler may have mistaken the former for a Lat lemma.]

The ordinary statement that the change of form was due to the influence of FEUD sb.[2] is obviously incorrect; FEUD sb.[2] is not recorded in our material until half a century after the appearance of the forms foode, feood, and would not account for them even if it were proved to have existed earlier, moreover, even in the 17th c. it was merely a rare technical word used by writers on the 'feudal system', and its sense is too remote from that of the northern feude for the assumed influence to have operated

A plausible supposition is that there was an OE. fiod* str fem (f. fiōgan to hate) corresponding to Goth fijaþwa as Feud (through Feude, Feudde) would then be the regularly normally become fede, coalescing with the Rom word of similar sound and meaning, but there may have been a northern form of the latter in which the word was pronounced with a 'rising' diphthong ief mod Eng four from OF flouvers, and from which the β forms were adopted In 17th c. the word was occasionally altered into FOREHOOD

-fic, suffix, repr L -fic-us '-making, -doing' (f weakened root of facĕre to make, do), forming adjs. (1) from sbs , with the sense 'making, causing, producing', as in homĭ-ficus, pācĭficus, or 'performing', as sacrĭficus, (2) from adjs , with the sense 'performing actions of a certain kind', as magnĭficus, also (in late and med L.) with the sense 'bringing into a specified state', as beātĭficus; (3) from vbs , with the sense 'causing to', as horrĭficus, terrĭficus, (4) from advbs , only in benĕficus, malĕficus, adjs of agency to the phrases benĕ, malĕ facere to do good, do ill (to) Except in the two last-mentioned words, and in veneficus (contr for venēnĭficus), the suffix -fic-us is always preceded by -i-, which is either the stem-vowel or a substitute for it, or a connecting vowel appended to a consonant-stem Most of the L adjs in -ficus appear in Fr , the termination being adapted as -(i)fique, also in It , Sp , Pg , the form being -fico In Eng the suffix prob first occurred in adoptions from Fr , like magnific, and was often spelt -i fique down to the 17th c In mediæval and mod L. new formations with -i- are very common, and many of them have passed, in adapted forms, into the Rom langs and Eng , as prolific, scientific In scientific nomenclature new words are still sometimes formed by the addition of the representative of -(i)ficus to L stems , such words, if accepted at all, are usually of international currency, and it is often uncertain in which lang they were first used , Eng examples are acidific, chylific, felific, morbific

Several L adjs in -ficus form their comparatives and superlatives, and their nouns of quality, from a stem in -ficent-. In Eng (but not in Romanic) the adopted forms of these end in -ficent, as beneficent, magnificent, maleficent, munificent

-fication (fikĭ·ʃən), suffix, repr L -ficātion-em, the regular formative of nouns of action (see -ATION) from vbs in -ficāre see -FY Many words of this formation (chiefly post-classical) were adopted in Fr with their related vbs , the sbs in learned form with the suffix -fication, and the vbs in semi-popular form with the suffix -fier ; on the analogy of these many new formations with these suffixes arose in Fr. From the 14th c. F. vbs. in -fier

with their corresponding agent-nouns in fication have been freely introduced into Eng ; as purify, purification, sanctify, sanctification , and hence the suffix -fication has become the recognized means of forming nouns of action corresponding to vbs. in -fy, except such as represent L. vbs in -ficere (see -FACTION) In general, however, such nouns of action are (unless as mere nonce-wds) formed only on assumable mod L types ; but beautification has been in use since 17th c, and words like Frenchification, transmogrification, ugtification may occasionally be met with In scientific language the suffix forms many sbs. (some of which have no corresponding vb); examples are acetification, acidification, chylification, dentification, ossification etc

Filibuster (fi·libʌstə), sb Forms · filibutor, 8–9 flibustier, 9 flibustor, filibuster, flibuster [The ultimate source is certainly the Du vrijbuiter, in Kilian vrybuyter (see Free-booter). It is not clear whether the 16th c Eng. form flibutor, of which we have only one example, was taken from Du directly or through some foreign lang. Late in the 18th c. the F form flibustier was adopted into Eng, and continued to be used, with occasional variations of spelling, until after the middle of the present century About 1850 54, the form filibuster, ad. Sp filibustero, began to be employed as the designation of certain adventurers who at that time were active in the W Indies and Central America ; and this has now superseded the earlier flibustier even with reference to the history of the 17th c

The mutual relation of the forms is involved in obscurity It is possible that the corruption of fr into fl may be due to the influence of the word Flibbert (Du Vlieboot, whence F Flibot, Sp flibote), but against this it may be urged that in our first quot the word seems to be applied to marauders on land In Fr the form fribustier occurs in the narrative of Eng freebooter) occurs in Du Tertre Hist des Ant Iles (1667) III. 151, but flibustier is app first recorded in A. O Oexmelin (Esquemeling) Hist. des Avanturiers (1686), this writer says that it comes from the Eng. flibustor 'corsair'; in the earlier ed of the work in Dutch (1678) the word does not occur It is possible on the one hand that the corrupt form of the Du word may be of Eng origin, and may have been taken into F from its use in the Eng colonies in the W Indies, or, on the other hand, that the F form arose in the European wars of the 16th c, and is the immediate source of Garrard's flibutor In any case the insertion of the s probably originated in Fr as a mere sign of vowel-length, though from the Dictionnaire de Trévoux we learn that the s was already pronounced in 1704 In the Dict. Etymologique of Ménage (who died in 1692), v Filbot, the form Flibustier occurs, with the explanation (doubtless erroneous) 'celui qui gouverne un flibot'. The sp flibustero is presumably ad F. flibustier]

It has been suggested that finikin is the original form and is of Du origin, cf MDu Apinkens adv. accurately neatly, prettily (Kilian). On this hypothesis the word finical and finick sb and vb must in some way have been evolved from finikin The conjecture however is unsupported by evidence, and finical appears 70 years earlier than the earliest known instance of finikin.]

Fire-cross, fi ery-cro'ss. [See CROSS 13.] A signal used anciently in Scotland, and more recently in the Highlands, to summon the men to a rendezvous on the sudden outbreak of war.

It was called in Gaelic crosstharaidh or crann tharaidh a cross or beam of gathering, and consisted of a cross or piece of wood burnt at one end and dipped in blood at the other: upon which a fiery cross was made, and was handed from clansman to clansman, each man immediately on receiving it running with it to his nearest neighbour, so as to spread the alarm throughout a district in a short time. References to it are often mere guesses founded on the name
